Images of interest to the eye are placed on the fovea, the part of the retina with the highest acuity. Eye movements help try to keep those images stationary on the retina even if the object or head moves. Types of eye movement may be divided into two categories depending on the purpose. Movements that aim to bring and stabilise objects into the fovea are saccades, pursuits, vergences and fixations. Another concern is cost. Commercially available eye tracking systems are expensive relative to other available methods in psychology such as brain imaging. Some traditionalists suggest that traditional methods are easy to implement and are virtually free for many researchers who have access to undergraduate assistants (Van, 2007). Research Methods in Psychology. Criticisms of Psychology. References. Psychology differs from the other social sciences anthropology, economics, political science, and sociology in seeking to explain the mental processes and behavior of individuals. Psychology differs from biology and neuroscience in that it is primarily concerned with the interaction of mental processes and behavior on a systemic level, as opposed to studying the biological or neural processes themselves. In contrast, the subfield of neuropsychology studies the actual neural processes and how they relate to the mental effects they subjectively produce.
