A breast biopsy is usually done after a suspicious lesion is discovered on either Mammography or Ultrasound in order to get tissue for pathological diagnosis. Several methods for a breast biopsy now exist. The most appropriate method of biopsy for a patient depends upon a variety of factors, including the size, location, appearance and characteristics of the abnormality. The different types of breast biopsies include fine needle aspiration (FNA), vacuum assisted biopsy, core needle biopsy, and A breast biopsy is a test that removes tissue or sometimes fluid from the suspicious area. The removed cells are examined under a microscope and further tested to check for the presence of breast cancer. A biopsy is the only diagnostic procedure that can definitely determine if the suspicious area is cancerous. The good news is that 80% of women who have a breast biopsy do not have breast cancer. There are three types of biopsies. As with fine-needle aspiration, this may involve ultrasound. During an ultrasound-guided core needle biopsy, the patient lies down while the doctor holds the ultrasound against the breast to direct the needle. On the other hand, during a stereotactic-guided core-needle biopsy, the doctor uses x-ray equipment and a computer to guide the needle. Clinical guidelines for the management of breast cancer. December 2016. Clinical guidance for the management of Breast cancer to all practitioners, clinicians and health care professionals providing a service to all patients across the West Midlands Clinical Network. Diagnostic excision biopsies should rarely be required. However, some breast lesions may still require diagnostic excision if the core biopsy or FNA is not benign (e.g. B3/4 or C3/4 lesions). The presence of atypia in a core biopsy is recognised as a marker of increased risk of cancer being present and consideration should be given to excision of all B3 lesions with atypia. For breast fine needle aspiration specimens. Diagnostic category code (C1-5). Screening and symptomatic therapeutic resections
