Keys and locks can be found from the Georgian, Victorian, and Edwardian periods, as well as different styles such as Art Deco, Gothic and Arts and Crafts styles. Gothic keys and locks are typical of the Mediaeval-style and are elaborate in design, often with decorative patterns, and inspired by Gothic architecture. A Gothic lock stands out for its quadrilateral shape and decorative foliage around the keyholes. A collector looking for a key from the Georgian era will come across large iron keys with rounded or flat bows. Sometimes more ornate keys from the period can be found with decorative bo

The locks-and-keys approach represents pointers as ordered pairs (key, address) where the key is an integer value. Heap-dynamic variables are represented as the storage for the variable plus a cell for an integer lock value. When a variable is allocated, a lock value is created and placed both into the variable's cell and into the pointer's key cell. Every access to the pointer compares these two values, and access is
