Infant psychology, Infants, Human locomotion. Publisher. Chicago : University of Chicago Press. Collection. inlibrary; printdisabled; internetarchivebooks. Describe the development of depth perception in infancy. There are a lot of different cues used to estimate depth (distance). Able to perceive depth when they are ready to crawl. Adolph (2008) argues that infants are "learning to learn" when developing balance and locomotion skills. What is meant by this expression and how is it different from the maturation view of motor development? Learning to sit, crawl, or walk, infants learn how to adapt to current biomechanical constraints. What infants learn in one posture must be relearned in a new posture, taking into consideration the new constraints for the new posture. Amodal. information that can be presented to different senses such as duration, rate and intensity.
