Parent-teacher relationships only work well if a teacher not only puts in the effort to respond to your concerns and questions, but also reaches out to share concerns and compliments with you. What can you do when you think the teacher isn't living up to her part?

Approach Issues Head-On. Dealing with a difficult teacher is hard but not as uncommon as you may think. Some parents shoulder the blame and responsibility for their child's problems, not talking with the school because they feel as if it's their issue alone to deal with. Some parents get the feeling that the school is passing judgment on their parenting when they receive a phone call asking to sit down and talk about their child. That's not always the case. These days, children and teenagers ARE READING (read) lots of books by authors like Stephenie Meyer, JK Rowling and Philip Pullman. Ben, a teenager, says, 'I AM READING (read) a great book at the moment. It IS (be) by a crime writer called Henning Mankel.' His friend Sam adds, 'My favourite books ARE (be) by fantasy writers.' Sam's sister says, 'My parents usually GIVE (give) me books for my birthday and this year, I AM READING (read) lots of short stories. Librarians say, 'It's great. These days, more and more young people ARE USING (use) libraries. They usually START (start) with JK Rowling's books when they are nine or ten years old but then they TRY (try) different authors.'

A book for parents and teachers. By dr. haim g. ginott. Teachers are expected to reach unattainable goals with inadequate tools. The miracle is that at times they accomplish this impossible task. Schools, however, cannot survive on miracles. Every teacher deserves effective tools and skills.Â This book says, Yes. On the basis of techniques developed in child therapy and tested in the classroom, concrete suggestions and practical solutions are offered for dealing with daily situations and psychological problems faced by all teachers. The philosophy of this book is best summed up in the following words, written by the author as a young teacher: I have come to a frightening conclusion. I am the decisive element in the classroom.

Parents teach a lot to the children and the ground made by them shapes the future of the children. On the other hand, someone learns throughout his life and thus become the person he really is. In this learning process, he himself contributes the most and teachers, friends, nature, books, academic education are important as well. So someone himself is the best teacher for him. Besides this the things we learn from our life experiences, teachers and books become far more important than what we learned in our infant time. Parents do their fine duty to raise a child to become a good adult and later he gets the education and experiences from his life and school play the vital role for his future. In terms of being our teachers, our experience and nature play an utmost important role. Teacher benefits. Research shows that parental involvement can free teachers to focus more on the task of teaching children. Also, by having more contact with parents, teachers learn more about students' needs and home environment, which is information they can apply toward better meeting those needs. Parents who are involved tend to have a more positive view of teachers, which results in improved teacher morale. Good two-way communication. Clarity and usefulness of communication: Parents and teachers should have the information they need to help students, in a form and language that makes sense to them. Surprise a parent. Parents are not accustomed to hearing unsolicited positive comments from teachers about their children, especially in a phone call from the school. Borrow this book to access EPUB and PDF files. When being a child, parents teach us how to crawl, to walk, to stand and to talk as well as to behave in proper manners. They teach us know to say "thank you" when receiving a present or help from someone and say "sorry" when doing something wrong. Moreover, they also tell us how to deal with strangers or how to make important decision in our daily life. Parents give us practical knowledge, not sophisticated one at school. For me, my parents are always the worthiest teachers. They always have time, care for me and teach me with all their immense love. Therefore, we have to take better care of our parents to repay their efforts to teach us.

Parent and Teacher conferences. Communication is an essential component to your child's academic success. By increasing your level of communication, you are optimizing your child's ability to perform well in the educational environment. Teachers, on the other hand, rarely get the opportunity to focus on a child as an individual in the classroom and rarely get to a point where they are just as familiar with a child as a parent is. While there is not a lot of room in the classroom for individualized instructions, it is important for a parent to express the characteristics and qualities of their child to the teacher so that the teacher may have a better understanding of the child as a unique student. Should a situation arise, this information could prove to be exceptional in overcoming that situation.

Children's books have proven to be a strong medium for helping preschoolers learn high level language structures and so speech language pathologists (SLPs) are encouraged to use books in therapy (e.g., American Speech-Language-Hearing Association, 2008; Justice & Kaderavek, 2004; van Kleeck, 2006b; van Kleeck et al., 2003). In conclusion, while parents are not the ideal teachers, and well-rounded children will generally need a great diversity of teachers in their lives in order to have a more accurate view of the world, parents are generally the most committed of all teachers and have the greatest emotional investment in their children and their future. Are parents are best teachers? Different people will give different responses to this question from their own characters, emotional concerns and even educational backgrounds. However, when it comes to me, I believe that parents are our best teachers for the following reasons. For instance, they can often buy books on our favored topics such as sea animals and astronomical objects. A Child Becomes a Reader. Proven ideas from research for parents. Produced by RMC Research Corporation, Portsmouth, New Hampshire Authors. Bonnie B. Armbruster, Ph.D., University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign Fran Lehr, M.A., Lehr & Associates, Champaign, Illinois. Jean Osborn, M. Ed., University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. Children learn vocabulary in two ways: indirectly, by hearing and seeing words as they listen, talk, and read; and directly by parents and teachers teaching them the meanings of certain words. Vocabulary and knowledge of the world are, of course, very closely tied together. Children who know something about the world are much better able to understand what they read about in school.

For parents, letting children talk politely with shop assistants and people in lifts and restaurants is a positive way to keep the context real for them. Also, encouraging positive behaviour when playing with friends or asking for something supports the process enormously. Children don't learn these behaviours automatically, yet they are an essential part of being a well-rounded adult. Parents and teachers can both share valuable insights into a child's personality. Teachers can pass on information about how the child copes with a classroom environment, and additional strengths and skills which they have uncovered through various activities. Teachers can keep parents informed about the syllabus, including themes, which can be easy to reinforce at home.
