American Constitution The United States Constitution was written in 1787 during the Philadelphia Convention. After ratification in eleven states, in 1789 elected officers of government assembled in New York City, replacing the Articles of Confederation government.

Background: Declaration of Independence: On June 4, 1776, a resolution was introduced in the Second Continental Congress declaring the "United States are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." In their new constitutions written since 1776, Americans required community residency of voters and representatives, expanded suffrage, and equalized populations in voting districts. There was a sense that representation "had to be proportioned to the population." One theme in American history was the gradual expansion of the franchise. Mrs. Suffern here in 1914 wears a sash and carries a sign reading "Help us to win the vote." The Constitutional Convention largely side stepped the issue of slavery, but did not ignore it. As powers vested in the Federal Government has to be specifically enumerated, the question of slavery became a state matter. While an icon of American democracy, the American Constitution and the Republic it created is not without its modern critics. Most of the critics come from the left of the political spectrum, The Constitution and the American Republic are criticized historically for leaving many groups out of the political process (landless white, blacks, and women).

I just read a fun essay. It was by Jack N. Rakove, called "Why American Constitutionalism Worked". It's very much in the context of a volume of scholarship devoted to exploring Edmund Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France, so having read that text is a very helpful, but not essential, foundation from which to approach the essay. And it wasn't that long. It was insightful, but not fathoms deep. Still, it was an excellent overview of the character and spirit of the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention of 1787. Part I considers the challenge constitutional history, as written in recent decades, poses to traditional theories of constitutional doctrine. It describes Ackerman's work as an effort to formulate a new theory of doctrinal change that is consistent with constitutional history. Part II discusses differences between historians' and lawyers' approaches to historical research. Part V posits an aspect of American constitutionalism--what might be termed a "preservation theme"--that is at odds with the radicalism of "transformative moments" and of which Ackerman must take account in developing his theory. Those assessing constitutional change from a legal perspective address it in terms of constitutional amendments and court decisions--especially the decisions of the Supreme Court. The United States Constitution has served as the supreme law of the United States since taking effect in 1789. The document was written at the 1787 Philadelphia Convention and was ratified through a series of state conventions held in 1787 and 1788. Since 1789, the Constitution has been amended twenty-seven times; particularly important amendments include the ten amendments of the United States Bill of Rights and the three Reconstruction Amendments.
