Each anecdote is traced (when possible) to a known Platonic doctrine or is compared with the known events of Plato's life and the history of the period. Riginos also discusses at length the motives of the authors of the anecdotes in spreading their stories. She shows that most of the anecdotes stem from one of two traditions: one that was favorable to Plato (including disciples such as Speusippus, the originator of the Apollo legend, and Neoplatonist writers), and one that was antipathetic (including writers of rival schools of philosophy, comic poets and satirists, and others).
