Slaves vs Indentured Servants The difference between slaves and indentured servants has been blurred because of the changes that happened across various points. Historically speaking, before the American Civil War, both indentured servants and slaves were regarded as the property of the master or the owner. However, laws that were enacted (post Civil War era) to protect the servants' rights removed the stigma that servants are their master's personal property. 4. Slaves are never remunerated for their services while servants are working in exchange for a previously agreed upon amenity, free accommodation, or passage to another country. Some are also given "freedom dues" after their term as servants. Indentured servants, or White slaves, as they should be called, rarely saw their benefits. The term of service was often extended, and many of the boys and girls who were captured died in slavery. Indentured Servitude in Colonial America by Deanna Barker http://www.geocities.com/nai_cilh/servitude.html. "One half to two thirds of all immigrants to Colonial America arrived as indentured servants." In theory, the person is only selling his or her labor. In practice, however, indentured servants were basically slaves and the courts enforced the laws that made it so. The treatment of the servant was harsh and often brutal. In fact, the Virginia Colony prescribed "bodily punishment for not heeding the commands of the master." (Ballagh, 45) Half the servants died in the first two years.
