Fiction's Father of Time Travel? Today, true-life scientists tinker with life-forms largely at the genetic level, creating such oddities

The Time Traveller accidentally travels further into the future. The days and nights grow longer, and evidence of mankind disappears. The moon vanishes, and the sun sits still, large and red and dull, in the western sky. The air grows thinner. He fights off monstrously large crabs and travels even further into the future, where the sun is nearly extinguished, and the only sign of life is a green slime.

I've just watched the 1960 version of "The Time Machine" on TCM! I wondered about those 3 books myself. Perhaps he chose a full edition of the Oxford Dictionary, and two volumes by Charles Darwin: "The Origin of the Species", and "The Descent of Man". More likely, and more useful though, would have been something on farming, something on engineering, and something on medicine. I've no knowledge of appropriate titles from that period.
