Melodic post-hardcore from the label that brought us Modern Baseball. The Horror Of Life. This song is by J Church and appears on the album The Horror Of Life (2007). She says she's never lived away from the coastShe says that landlocked is the thought that scares her the mostShe says the ocean has affected her mindAnd surely this is something people find. Walk along the ocean,Walk towards the bay,Passing by the Armory the night turns into day (night turns into day),Stars politely silent,The moon has nothing relevant to say. The disturbing horror of life~. Hiss in the light and hide in the dark. In a rotten world, with monsters, called humans. Misery and sadness, the light is gone, a long time ago. There's no more light in the hearts of people. Minds, full of darkness, heads full of demons. Flesh and blood, the world will suffer. Sticks and stones, no more breathing. The creation of hate, destruction of life. Hate creation, bloodstained flowers on the graveyards. Anxiety, everywhere in this society.

I ran back into my date's room. To my horror, she wasn't in bed where I left her. I called out her name, but there was no response. I had just walked through the entire apartment, so it literally made no sense to me that she wasn't there. The window was shut tight, plus it was the second story. It was as if she vanished. I grabbed my wallet, keys, and cell phone and ran out of the apartment in nothing but my underwear. The shadowy figure was gone. I jumped in my car and sped away. I never heard from her again. Her Tinder profile was deleted the next day, and she never responded to any of my texts. Till this day, I have no idea wtf happened that night. I also never went back to her apartment, mostly because it's horrible with directions and she lived in the next town over.

It was almost like a shadow, but I could discern that it was a three-dimensional figure. This figure was large in stature; there's no way it could've been my date. She was maybe 5'1" at best. I ran back into my date's room. To my horror, she wasn't in bed where I left her. I called out her name, but there was no response.
