When social workers experience their selves as complex and dialogical, they are more open to the influence of the other (Bakhtin, 1993). We make the case for practitioners to work on a reflexive self rather than attempting to achieve ego control through the management of anxiety. Discover the world's research. 15+ million members. How can a social work research methodology be developed which is relevant to the workplace? This innovative collection approaches social work research from the 'bottom' up. Instead of starting with theory, it starts with practice, showing how a research methodology can be developed from actual experience.
