Creating Corporate Advantage. David Collis. Cynthia A. Montgomery. True, corporate executives face mounting pressure from their boards and from capital markets to add value. To date, however, that pressure has had the greatest impact on corporate strategy in pathological companies such as ITT, where the destruction of value was so great that it had to be stopped. What has slipped under the radar are those companies—the majority, we would argue—that don't destroy value at the corporate level, but neither do they create it. Deploying key resources where they are important to the competitive advantage of individual businesses is at the heart of corporate strategy. Sometimes it makes sense for businesses to share a common resource, like a sales force or an MIS system.
