Jonathan Jones wrote in The Guardian: "A century ago, cave art was still barely accepted as being genuine. When Marcelino Sanz de Sautuola claimed in 1880 that paintings in Altamira cave in Spain were prehistoric, he was mocked and reviled as a faker. Gradually their antiquity was recognised but it was only when tremendous depictions of animals were found at Lascaux in France in 1940 that cave art exploded into modern culture." of Human Societies™ edited by Chris Scarre (Thames & Hudson, 2005); "The Dawn of European Art: An Introduction to Palaeolithic Cave Painting" by Andr   Leroi-Gourhan (Cambridge University Press, 1982); "The Origin of Modern Humans" by Roger Lewin (Scientific American Library, 1993). In the painted caves of western Europe, namely in France and Spain, we witness the earliest unequivocal evidence of the human capacity to interpret and give meaning to our surroundings. Through these early achievements in representation and abstraction, we see a newfound mastery of the environment and a revolutionary accomplishment in the intellectual development of humankind. The painted walls of the interconnected series of caves in Lascaux in southwestern France are among the most impressive and well-known artistic creations of Paleolithic humans.Â Further Reading.
