Politics of Climate Justice provides the vital background and theoretical context to what happened at the COPS in Kyoto, Copenhagen, Cancun, and Durban. It explores the favored strategies of key elites from the crisis ridden global and national power blocs, including South Africa, and finds them incapable of reconciling the threat to the planet with their economies' addiction to fossil fuels. Finally, the book reveals sites of climate justice and interrogates the new movement's approach. Specifications. Publisher.

There they fell during 2011, one after the other in past-their-prime domino descent: Zine El Abidine Ben Ali from Tunis, Hosni Mubarak from Cairo, Dominique Strauss-Kahn from the International Monetary Fund (IMF), Muammar Gaddafi from Tripoli, Georgios Papandreou from Athens, Silvio Berlusconi from Rome, US football guru and sex-crime cover-upper Joe Paterno from Penn State University. And outside Durban's International Convention Centre, in the broader society, is there a potential for a Climate Spring like the Arab Spring? "The history of humanity shows us that it has always been a big crisis that has made us move," he responded. What is climate justice and can it be revived within the movement against climate change? You're invited to a brown-bag lunch discussion with Patrick Bond, director of Centre for Civil Society based in Durban, South Africa, about his new book, Politics of Climate Justice: Paralysis Above, Movement Below. Politics of climate justice. Paralysis above, movement below. P Bond. System change - Not climate change. Thirdly, we contend that climate justice politics generates solidarities between differently located struggles and these solidarities have the potential to shift the terms of debate on climate change. Bringing these logics into conversation can develop the significance of climate justice for political practice and strategy. We conclude by considering what is at stake in different articulations of climate justice and tensions in emerging forms of climate politics. View. Show abstract. 2012.
