The excerpt above from a letter to his wife addresses the problems he had in fully expressing his feelings to her as well as to "every sister & brother of the human race." As a well-known author and lecturer, who was often referred to as "the Sage of Concord," Emerson had a firmly established public persona behind which he could take refuge. The correspondence with Fuller is also revealing, with Emerson endorsing one of her first letters to him with "what shocking familiarity!" but concluding, in a memoir of her, that "it was impossible long to hold out against such urgent assault."
