United States Government Policy On Refugees From Nazism, 1933-1940

Barbara McDonald Stewart

Events and policies will shift and be shaped by the unfolding interplay of events in real time. This was the “other America” that rejected Nazism and stood up for a minority of about 4%. The rallies also illustrated fissures in society with a mixture of Christian support and opposition and markedly, no black American participation in NYC. In the fall of 1930 the League of Nations authorized the High Commission on Refugees, but decided that the commissioner should report to a governing board of representatives from interested nations (including nonmembers like the United States). This effectively removed the issue of Jewish refugees from the League. The U.S. State Department viewed the Commission as an irritant that would flood the US with refugees.
