And the way the grandmothers were always available, making the four the six but where were the mothers, children had mothers, and these two little girls had Hannah and Mary, both startlingly unlike the blonde family they had married into, being small and dark, and, while pretty enough, Theresa knew neither of them was good enough for the men. They worked. They owned a business. That is why the grandmothers were so often here. Didn't the grandmothers work, then? Yes, they did but were free to say, "Let's go to Baxter's" and up here to Baxters they came. The little girls felt Mary's panic, her anger, sensed some kind of fatality, and now tried to get back to their grandmothers. "Granny, Granny, I want granny." Mary gripped them both tight. My grandma got lost and stopped to ask a woman for directions. Several minutes later, she found herself driving by the same woman and asked for directions again, having apparently taken another wrong turn. "You know, maybe you shouldn't be driving at your age," the woman yelled at my grandma. Conversely, she recently drove to the dentist and mentioned to the receptionist how she got lost on the way. After her appointment, the receptionist insisted she drive to my grandmother's house and she could follow along in her Camry.
