In July, we asked our 11,500 staff and partners to complete a diversity profile, which included race, gender, disability, sexual orientation and education levels. Such detailed profiling work is not that common in the private sector, compared with the public sector which has led the way historically. Ninety-three per cent of our firm completed the form on a voluntary basis but there's still work to do. To this end, the 30 events we are hosting will give our staff the opportunity to listen and engage on subjects such as social mobility, disability and how behavioural economics can inform cultural change. Many of these events discuss subjects which have sometimes been thought of as taboo in the City, such as depression.
