The Métis in the West were for the most part bilingual, speaking Cree and either English or French. With the development of the Hudson's Bay Company in the Northwest, also called Rupert's Land, a permanent Métis community was established along the Red River (in what is today Manitoba). Their estimated number at that time was over 5,000 French-speaking Métis and over 4,000 English-speaking Métis. Other communities were set up along the fur routes, from northern Alberta to Manitoba, Ontario and the American border. For the Canadian capitalist class, the Métis resistance and their demands for territorial and political rights were an obstacle to the economic development they had planned for the West. They had to crush the movement. The Métis people helped to shape the Canada of today, mainly in terms of the expansion of the west. The first Métis people were born in Eastern Canada as early as the 1600s. They were the children born to European fishermen and their Native wives. However, it was the Red River region, in present day Manitoba, where the Métis Nation was really first established. When the fur trade moved west, in the 1700s and 1800s, many French-Canadian fur traders found Native wives and had children. The children born from these unions formed a new Nation in Canada - the 'Western Métis'. Today there North-West Rebellion, violent insurgency in 1885 fought between the Canadian government and the Métis and their aboriginal allies, in regions of Canada later known as Saskatchewan and Alberta.
